

July 19, 2016

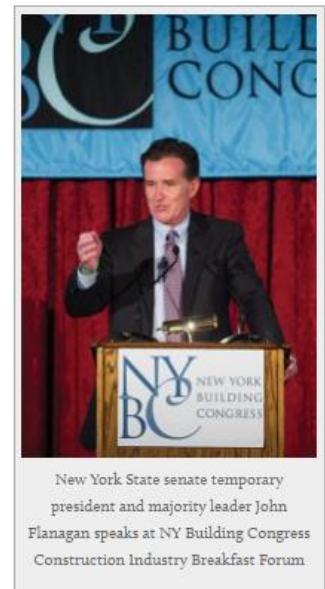

<https://cre.nyrej.com/senate-majority-leader-flanigan-gives-updates-javits-center-421-transportation-funding-legislation-breakfast-forum/>

Senate majority leader Flanigan gives updates on Javits Center, 421-a, transportation funding & legislation at breakfast forum

New York, NY New York State senate temporary president and majority leader John Flanigan offered a wide-ranging update on the recently-concluded legislative session and the status of a number of issues important to the design, construction, and real estate industry, during a New York Building Congress Construction Industry Breakfast Forum held on June 29.

Senator Flanigan noted the Senate, Assembly, and governor Cuomo had come together on a plan to increase capital funding for the State Department of Transportation and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, as well as set aside $1 billion for the expansion of the Javits Center, which will be constructed using the innovative design-build approach.

In a frank exchange during the question-and-answer period, senator Flanigan pointed to a lack of consensus as the primary reason why certain building industry priorities—including an expansion of design-build authority to include the city of New York, an emergency responder act, and a new 421-a program—were not resolved during the session.

New York State senate temporary president and majority leader John Flanigan speaks at NY Building Congress Construction Industry Breakfast Forum.

Shown (from left) are: Tonio Burgos, CEO, Tonio Burgos & Associates; Sabrina Kanner, executive vice president – design & construction, Brookfield Property Partners L.P.; Richard Anderson, president, New York Building Congress; hon. John Flanigan, NYS Senate temporary president and majority leader; Ed Cox, chair, NYGOP; Gary LaBarbera, president, Building & Construction Trades Council.

Referring to the expiration of the original 421-a program as a “missed opportunity,” senator Flanigan nonetheless expressed optimism about a future compromise, saying, “No one can provide greater leadership in this area than governor Andrew Cuomo. In my humble opinion, if he puts everybody in a room, sits everybody down, and tells everybody that nobody’s going home until things are negotiated and compromised, then I think we can get there.”

Senator Flanigan also took a moment to describe his admiration for New York City and the industry. “The more time I spend in this city, the more I learn, the more I interact with people, and the more I appreciate its history, beauty, and complexity,” he said, while also applauding the way the city’s residents, especially those in the building and construction industry, banded together following September 11. He said, “New Yorkers proved that under the worst circumstances, we can be at our best.”

Senator Flanagan’s address was preceded by remarks from Building & Construction Trades Council of Greater New York president Gary LaBarbera, who responded to a recent Building Congress report on the record level of construction employment in the city. “Every indication is that the industry will continue to be robust over the next several years,” he said, citing the Building Congress’s finding that industry employment has reached its highest level in over four decades. LaBarbera explained that the building trades have made adjustments to successfully support New York’s building boom and meet the intense demand for skilled labor, including the creation of new categories of workers and increasing the number of apprentices.